The curriculum in the NSW State Schools touches on the landing of the First Fleet on 26th January 1788, the nine months journey led by Captain Arthur Phillip, and the establishment of the penal colony at Sydney Cove.

I have had the opportunity to talk to six primary school classes during the first and second terms about the people of the First Fleet, how they survived on the food they carried with them as well as the stores they were able to purchase at the three ports they called at; being Tenerife, Rio de Janeiro and Cape Town.

To add flavour to the classes, the children at the Budgewoi Primary School, on the Central Coast, got into the theme of the occasion and made 'history come alive' by dressing in uniforms of marines and sailors a serving girl and a convict. We looked at the Queen Anne flag, being the flag raised by Captain Cook in 1770, and Captain Arthur Phillip in 1788, compared it to the 'Union Jack' that we have as part of the Australian flag.

I know that others of you are doing the same type of presentation at your local primary schools and encourage those of you who are able to let your local school know that you are available to do this.

I also spoke to the Terrigal CWA during September.

As we approach the 220th Anniversary of the landing of the First Fleet, we remember that that was the time that approximately 700 convicts commenced the balance of their penal servitude at Sydney Cove. Their eventual freedom came at a cost to some, but the opportunities that were given to those who worked hard are seen in the attitude of a fair go for the battler. Some of the marines and sailors chose to stay in the Colony, others were sent to Norfolk Island and were eventually transferred to Van Diemens Land in 1807/8, being the end of the first settlement there.

History Week has been celebrated in some areas with special events. We were able to man information desks at both Lake Haven and Tuggerah shopping centres for two days of that week.

Speech as Guest of Honour at the Australia Day Luncheon, 20 January 2007

*Her Excellency
Professor Marie
Bashir AV CVO
Governor of NSW*

Mr John Haxton, President, Fellowship of First Fleeters, and Mrs Beryl Haxton, Mr Rod Best and Mr Peter Christian OAM, Vice-Presidents, other office bearers and committee members, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen,

It is with great pleasure that Nicholas and I join you today to celebrate the 219th Anniversary of Australia Day.

On the occasion of my swearing in as 37th Governor of New South Wales on March 1, 2001 - the oldest public office in our land, I was deeply aware of our historic legacy, as well as the modern challenges facing me.

I could not but reflect upon the determination of those early military governors, Phillip, Hunter, King, Bligh and Macquarie to succeed, and upon the courage, the assertiveness, and the critical decisions of both, which established the foundation of an ultimately strong, stable and fair society.

I would like to take this opportunity to applaud the Fellowship of First Fleeters for their continuing efforts to hold high the importance of those early Australians and the history of that period.

An understanding of our history, as well as strengthening our sense of nationhood and illuminating the way ahead also enables us to appreciate the contribution of our predecessors. And it may also possibly prevent the development of a collective arrogance, as success follows success in this blessed land.

Inge Glendinnen's "Dancing With Strangers", books on Bennelong, and in a slightly later period Miriam Estensen's wonderful works - one on Matthew Flinders, another on George Bass - are enriching a sense of history and pride in Australia's early development.

What touches me deeply in these historical accounts of those difficult early years of isolation and settlement, are the aspects of deep humanity which are revealed, and with which so often we can identify.

The story of Lieutenant Ralph Clark comes frequently to mind. (ie. The story of Lt Clark on the HMS Friendship and Ralph Hunt's gift of a little dog from the Camaraigal Tribe to replace the one which he had lost as the First Fleet was sailing down the Atlantic Ocean.)

Another aspect of the First Fleet which has given me endless delight, deriving from information which I received on a trip to Brazil in 2005, is the story of the First Fleett's arrival in Rio de Janero, and the welcome accorded to Captain Phillip (reading from a book.)

There is no doubt that Governor Phillip was by any standard of assessment, a most exceptional man.

In the visits of year 11 and 12 student leaders - captains and vice-captains, to Government House, two things come to mind for which we must all be grateful.

The first that we should never cease to be grateful is that if the destiny of this great continent was to be colonisation and settlement by Europeans, that Australia had the great blessing to be settled by England, and that this event took place in the 18th Century - the Century of Enlightenment.

And secondly, that the leader chosen to undertake the hogh responsibility of leadership was Captain Arthur Phillip RN.

I have no doubt that all of you are very familiar with our first governor, not only from the various historical writings, particularly First Fleet records, burt also from his own journal.

When Phillip's appointment to establish the new colony was announced, Captain John Fortesque stated "... I do think God Almighty made Phillip on purpose for the place, for never did a man better know what to do, or with more determination to see it done, and yet if they will let him, he will make them all very happy."

(Ref: Fellowship of First Fleeters websitewww.geocities.com/fellowship_of_first_fleeters)

An example of Phillip's humanity could not be better illustrated by this vignette.

Before he had reached Sydney Cove, Phillip tried to show his officers that they would need to be more than soldiers and disciplinarians. When he learned that they were flogging sailors who had failed to maintain their watch on the deck of the Sirius, he said - "The men are all we have to depend upon. And if we abuse those men that we have to trust, the convicts will rise and assaure us all. Those men are our support. We have a long and severe situation to go through in settling this colony, at least we cannot expect to return in less than five years. This ship and her crew are to protect and support the country, and if they are ill-treated by their own officers, what support can you expect of them?"

Nearly half the passenger on the First Fleet were military men - the marines and officers who would become the New South Wales Corps. It is likely that those considered to be the best and bravest had been kept in Britain. Ten years after settlement, its finest officers were fighting Napoleon in Europe.

Phillip realised the importance of encouraging leadership in his men, since they would not only protect the colony from indigenous tribes, but would be the supervisors who directed convict labour, the police who enforced the law, the bureaucrats who controlled the trade and commerce. And when they completed their service, they would join the ranks of the settler farmers who would produce much-needed food for the new colony.

Adequate evidence exists also that Governor Phillip's transaction with the indigenous people were consistently characterised by respect and humanity, and in his own words, a wish to "reconcile than to have us live among them".

Phillip's perseverance, optimism and great vision for the future of the tiny settlement were indeed extraordinary. He reveals this in a four-page letter written 219 years ago from Sydney (July 1788) to his Patron, the Marquis of Landsdown, Sir William Petty:

"Perhaps no country in the world affords less assistance to First Settlers. Still, my Lord, I think that perseverance will answer every purpose proposed by the Government, that this country will hereafter be almost valuable acquisition to Great Britain from its situation."

Australia's First Chief Constable

Who knows the first Chief Constable of Australia?

Article by Zillah Campbell (FF# Henry Kable)

There is a fascinating insight into a particular part of early policing within the new NSW colony.

The Marines of the First Fleet were the keeper of law and order upon the original settlement of the convict colony at Port Jackson in 1788. However only 6 years later one Henry Kable was appointed to the position of Chief Constable of the colony.

Henry Kable created a number of "firsts", which included his marriage with fellow-convict Susannah Holmes alongside four other couples in the first marriage ceremony in Australia conducted by Rev. Richard Johnson on February 10th, 1788.

Henry and his future wife Susannah Holmes arrived with the first fleet as prisoners. Records reveal that Henry was sentenced in March 1783 to be 'hanged until dead' for the heinous offence of burglary. This was later reduced to seven years transportation. Susannah was also sentenced to death for a non related burglary but this was reduced to 14 years transportation.

Norwich Castle Gaol, Norfolk, where Henry and Susannah were incarcerated.

Both commenced their sentence at the frightful Norwich Castle Gaol, Norfolk and despite the cells and primitive conditions a union was formed which saw the arrival of Henry junior. When the first fleet was assembling for Botany Bay, Susannah and Henry junior were taken with two other female prisoners to Plymouth where they had been assigned to the convict transport 'Charlotte'. Henry Kable was left behind because his sentence was "transportation to America" - a technical hitch. However upon Susannah's arrival at Plymouth, the ships captain refused to take on board the baby, Henry junior, as the baby had no papers. The gaol turnkey Simpson who had delivered her to Plymouth travelled to London where he tried to see the Home

Secretary, Lord Sydney, to get papers for the child. Simpson failed at first but after a small demonstration by he and several well meaning sympathisers Sydney gave him an audience and arranged for papers for the child and for his father Henry Kable to join the fleet. Sydney re-assigned the mother and child, with Henry Kable to the convict transport 'Friendship', because he intended that ship to be a sort of hospital ship suitable for mothers with young children.

A London journalist picked up the story (possibly during the demonstration) considered it a gut-wrenching article for the London Chronicle and it was subsequently published. The newspaper published two follow up letters from well to do readers, which led to a collection being taken up amounting to 20 pounds. The money was subsequently outlaid on goods that were thought to be useful to a young couple at Botany Bay. The parcel of goods was given into the care of Captain Sinclair of the transport 'Alexander' to be delivered to the couple on their arrival at Botany Bay.

A fleet of 11 ships - with Arthur Phillip, the first governor of the settlement, in charge of 160 marines and 729 convicts - weighed anchor in Portsmouth, England, on May 13, 1787, and reached Botany Bay on the 18th January 1788. Finding it too barren, sandy, and shallow for permanent settlement, fresh water inadequate and the anchorages too open in the wide bays Phillip investigated the next inlet to the north. There, spreading its fingers of deep water into sheltered sandstone promontories, he found "one of the finest harbours in the world, in which a thousand sail on the line might ride in the most perfect security." The harbour, which had been discovered and named by Cook earlier, was Port Jackson -- now better known as Sydney Harbour.

But there was no shipboard romance, Henry and Susannah travelled firstly on 'Friendship' as far as Table Bay (Cape of Good Hope) where the Fleet took on supplies. Here Phillip split the fleet so that the faster vessels could speed ahead and start the settlement at Botany Bay before the rest arrived. Susannah and baby were transferred to the 'Charlotte'. Cramped, unbearably hot or cold due to their geographical location, it is perhaps a miracle that young Henry survived the journey (a number of newborn babies and an old female prisoner died). However the voyage was remarkably incident free. Upon arrival Susannah and the other women of the fleet were kept aboard the 'Charlotte' in Sydney Cove until nine days after the men had been disembarked there.

Chapter Liaison News

The FFF AGM will bring the end to yet another successful year and I must congratulate each of the nine Chapters who have undertaken a variety of activities. The chapters have had many interesting meetings with visiting guest speakers as well as chapter members sharing their ancestral stories.

I sincerely thank the Chapter Representatives who keep me informed of meetings, events, dates & times. Your response has assisted with reports presented to the Board meetings and has secured a page for Chapters in the National Newsletter.

Many FFF members have expressed interest in establishing a Chapter in both the northern & western suburbs of Sydney. A chapter brings a closer bond with like minded members as they attend meetings and visit places of historic interest.

The Board of Directors will work every step of the way with members who wish to inaugurate a chapter. For further information please contact Jean Mortimer.
